

Our English teacher suggested us to read the book called The Curious Incident of The Dog in The Night-Time written by Mark Haddon. It is a murder mystery novel, however, it is not only about a murder but also about the main character Christopher Boone who is a fifteen year old finding himself in his teenage life. I must say, the author captured the idea of the boy having autism perfectly. He used repetitive speech, made the text seem emotionless and the personality traits were just on point. All of those things made the story extra-special, as the book was written in the first person narrator.

Christopher lives with his Father, in a tiny town in England, called Swindon. Due to him having Asperger's syndrome, Christopher has a lot of fun doing and studying Maths, but a hard time understanding human beings. This adventure, though, opens up his and our eyes.

There are so many iconic episodes, like the one where Christopher every single detail about people's appearances, for example 'She was wearing boots which looked like army boots and there were 5 bracelets made out of a silver-coloured metal on her wrist and they made a jangling noise.' That is such a good addition because it makes the reader get involved into the story more.

I didn't like the style that much for it had repetitive words and many high-frequency words, but that had a reason, and so in that case it actually made the book better. Also, the author uses curse words in the book to create that 'living a simple life' effect, which gave that necessary touch to the context.

I personally think that this book should be read by teens and young adults as this is an interesting book and very unique in its writing and helps people understand kids and teens like Christopher much more.
